The Reconciliation of Gen. Grant and Gen. Butler.

A despatch to the Boston Advertiser tells the following story:

"The friends of Gen. Butler have for a long time been trying to bring him back to friendly relations with Gen. Grant. One delegation made an effort four months ago, but accomplished nothing, though Gen. Grant said to them that if there was a quarrel it was not on his side, and that he had no hostility towards Gen. Butler. Another delegation took up the matter two months ago and was equally unsuccessful, though Senator Wilson was one of the persons interested. George Wilkes finally engaged himself with the question, and seems to have helped Gen. Butler out of his difficulties. He talked with Gen. Butler and his friends and after learning their grievances had a talk with Gen. Grant. It appears that Gen. Butler was much incensed at Gen. Grant for removing him from the command of the Army of the James just before the end of the war, and that when Gen. Grant, during the first winter of his residence here, sent out the invitations to his first grand party, Gen. Butler conceived that the sending of one to him was intended as an insult. Whereupon he returned it in short order, since which time he has had no intercourse with Gen. Grant, except of a formal and official character. The adjustment of the situation was made by one letter from George Wilkes to Gen. Butler, one from Gen. Butler to George Wilkes, one from George Wilkes to Gen. Grant, and finally a note of ten or twelve lines from Gen. Grant to George Wilkes. It is understood that Gen. Butler voluntarily withdrew his rejection of Gen. Grant's party invitation on a statement from Mr. Wilkes that Gen. Grant said to him that he had not had the least intention to insult Gen. Butler in sending it, and was much surprised at its return. Gen. Grant further said, 'I regret that he meant no personal disrespect of Gen. Butler in the language of his report at the close of the war. That phrase about being "bottled up" was common in the army at that time, and was used to express an unfair towards him. Gen. Grant's note says that he is willing to consider Gen. Butler's return of his card as withdrawn, and that while he cannot open matters about his report, in which he had no intention of wronging any one, he is willing that Gen. Butler should ask for a court of inquiry if he chooses. The correspondence was brought to a conclusion with this note, and it is stated to be satisfactory to Mr. Butler's friends.

Thrilling Contrast.

A painter once met a beautiful child. So enraptured was he with its countenance and expression of loveliness, that he resolved to paint it. He did so, and hung his favorite picture in his study. He made it his guardian angel. In sorrow and in passion he sought relief and tranquility in gazing on that countenance. He proposed that if he ever saw its opposite he would paint that also. But years passed away before he found a face so infernally ugly as to satisfy his idea of a perfect contrast to his darling picture. It was that of a wretch lying in despair upon the floor of his cell. He painted that terrible countenance. But what must have been his emotions when he learned it was the same person he had painted before? The first was the face of the innocent child; the last that of the reckless, ruined youth. The best things perverted become the worst. The sweetest juice, changed, becomes the sharpest acids. That little angel's likeness had been metamorphosed into that of a fiend.
